Pamela Phillips has been named executive director of Renaissance of Annandale, a Premier Memory Care Community scheduled to open in Fairfax County winter 2019.

Phillips began her career as an educator in the Chesterfield County Schools and later became a successful local business owner in Fairfax County, where she taught music for 17 years. In 2012, following her mother's struggle with Alzheimer's, she changed careers to senior care.

"My mother's Alzheimer's journey was a turning point in my life, so I am now committed to providing the same compassionate care for families and their loved ones as they make similar journeys," Phillips said.

Among her many professional designations are Certified Dementia Practitioner, certification as a Virginia Post Facilitator, certification in Virtual Dementia Training, and certification in Palliative Care, Alzheimer's Dementia and Other Cognitive Diseases in the state of Virginia. In April 2014, she was recognized as a Long-Term Care Administrator for the Commonwealth of Virginia. Phillips has spent the last five years overseeing a local 60-bed memory care facility as executive director.

“Pamela’s proven record of leadership and her personal history caring for a loved one with Alzheimer’s made her the obvious choice for this role -- and will make Renaissance of Annandale an especially loving new home for our residents. This innovative new memory care community will provide a safe, caring and hopeful place for them and their families,” Chris Terry, regional vice president for Legacy Senior Living, management company of Renaissance of Annandale, said.

Phillips earned a bachelor’s degree in music education K-12 from Longwood University of Farmville, Va. She is a graduate of Oakton High School in Vienna, Va., and loves tennis and musical theater.
